face fact that peace and reconciliation (P&R) topic in last 7-8 years became kind of “unpopular” in WB and Turkey. Civil society limited activism in this field and start to work on EU and NATO integration that become mainstream topics. This happened because of 4 main reasons: 1) most of the post-conflict donators that start to invest in reconciliation left the countries what reflect on CSO sustainability and increasing level of the CSOs competitiveness for limited funds, 2) ongoing process of transitional justice was not well accepted and welcomed by citizens of the region but was initiated and putted on political Agenda by civil society (one of CSOs biggest achievements in this policy); polarization happened thanks to wider non-affirmative public campaign through Medias and continuous political populism and exploitation of this topic in daily politic rhetoric that have to blur current unacceptable socio-economic situation of citizens in the region; these facts still influence decreasing number of CSOs active in reconciliation field, 3) civil society becomes fragmented and contested. Limited funds and political climate at Western Balkan and Turkey countries influence strong interest – based as well ethnical fragmentation of civil sector where usually priority was given to promotion of national instead of transnational or inter-ethnic activism. CSO work in P&R field is often not welcomed by their governments but in many cases they are also judged by their colleagues and citizens because of hard straight – forward approach they have in advocating for transitional justice, 4) Currently there is lack of grass-root organization which are main actors and promoters of bottom – up approach in the implementation of reconciliation policy which working on interpersonal reconciliation on local level.

We want strong civil society, ready and resourceful to be main actor in peace and reconciliation policy what also correspond to formulation of our specific objective and because of that we want work on challenges they face these time.
